What distinguishes participatory design from related approaches such as user-centered design is that the latter supposes only that the research and design work is done on behalf of the users; in participatory design, this work must be done with the users (livari

Participatory design : definition of Participatory design

To accomplish this goal, participatory design aims to establish a creative space for users and designers where principles such as power sharing, knowledge exchange, and self-representation can be realized and put into practice. Through participation in design, the users of a service are given equal voice in the design of that service.
